

NEW OFFICIALS ARE SELECTED

COMANCHE CITY SCHOOLS TO BEGIN WORK SEPTEMBER 6TH

20 Years Ago

From The Comanche Chief, August 21, 1914

At the annual Cunningham reunion last week Mrs. Bettie Holmsley was the oldest member of the family present and Frances Cunningham, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Cunningham was the youngest.

Comanche County delegates to the State Democratic Convention last week were boosting Oscar Callaway for Governor in 1918. They say he will have the solid backing of the West. Congressman Callaway has his nerve, but is a modest chap and never fights unless some fellow shies a brick at him.—Hugh Nugent Fitzgerald in The Fort Worth Record.

Gayle Atwood joined the Navy at Norfolk, Virginia last week.

Pope Pious died at Vatican in Rome last week when he broke down as the result of the War and died of a broken heart.

For some time there has been fear of a low cotton market this year on account of the European war, but local cotton buyers are now quoting ten cents per pound and things look better.

The Southwest is a small town section, New Orleans, La., being the only town listed in the 1910 census as having a population of more than 100,000.

It begins to look like Joe Bailey is whetting his tomahawk for Senator Morris Sheppard's scalp and the bait he will use for Morris will be Woman's Suffrage and National Prohibition. This distance it looks like Joe will get Morris' Goat. Time will tell.

The peanut crop is reported to be fine. De Leon which marketed 150 cars last year is slated to ship 200 this fall according to reports.

At the El Paso convention last week it was demonstrated that Ferguson is to be a new star in the political horizon of Texas. It remains to be seen whether it is a fixed planet or merely a bright comet of transitory nature, but we believe that it is to be a fixed star of the first magnitude.

Captain J. V. Cunningham, Penitentiary Transfer Agent, was here Saturday attending the Cunningham reunion. He is one of the sons of Captain James and Aunt Susan Cunningham who came to Comanche County in 1855.

Miss Jennie Blue Tunnell will open her piano school next week. The high cost of the present European War recalls the fact that war is the most costly business on earth. The least expensive war on record for this country was the Spanish-American War in 1898 which was won by the U. S. in 101 days at a cost of $165,000,000 and with 2900 lives being lost.

Two fires were reported yesterday, one being the loss of a barn by N. E. Palmer at the house he recently bought from Jim Cunningham and the other being the Dr. S. P. Smith residence at Hase.

A special session of the Legislature has been called for Monday by Governor O. B. Colquitt to pass a bonded warehouse bill and cotton raisers.

W. O. Brightman and family returned from a fishing trip on the Concho via train after leaving their Ford stuck in the mud.

Comanche City Schools will open Thursday, September 6th at 9:00 a. m. Appropriate programs will be conducted in each of the three buildings. A larger enrollment is expected this year than last. A considerable increase is expected in the high school because of children from un-affiliated schools taking advantage of the opportunity given them by the State Department of Education to attend an affiliated high school according to Supt. W. G. Barrett.

This year, at last, the State will pay the tuition of a pupil who has finished his home school and wishes to attend Comanche High School. Besides this, Mr. Barrett said, the State will pay two dollars per month to such pupils for transportation expense. High school pupils can transfer even at the opening of school. Those eighteen years old or over before September 1st can attend without a transfer, all expenses being cared for by the State. As has been announced previously, no fees will be charged for anything. This will be a material saving to all students. Even typewriting will be free. Vocation agriculture has been added to the curriculum.

Grades 1, 2 and 3 will meet in the West Ward Building with Miss Agnes Graham, Principal, in charge and assisted by Misses Cordia Lindsey, Nobia Dunn and Berta Goodson. Grades 4, 5, 6 and Low 7th will meet in the Grammar School with A. D. Pettit, Principal in charge assisted by Misses Vera Beene, Gene Rape, Jewel Werner, Gaynelle Cauley and Dourous Brown. The High 7th and all high school grades will meet in the High School Building. The faculty members are Pat Cagle, Principal and Coach, L. N. Miller, Misses Ola Cunningham, Minnie Cunningham, Hattie Brightman, Martha Wetzel, and Frances Beason.

Much repair work has been done in the Grammar School and Ward School Buildings. The interiors have been re-decorated. Work will be rushed toward the painting of the exterior wood work, Mr. Barrett said, and added that telephones will be installed again in each building.

The Trustees and Faculty of Comanche City Schools invite all patron and friends of the schools to attend the opening exercises. With the cooperation of every one, officials of the schools, look forward to the best school year that the Comanche City School System has ever experienced.

In the fall of 1867 he came to Texas stopping for a time in Erath and McClellan Counties. In November, 1872 he came to Comanche County. On the 2nd day of October, 1873, he was married to Sarah Emily Harris who survives him. In the fall of 1874 he bought the home in the Shiloh community where (Continued on Last Page)

BRAUN REVEALED AS AN EX-CONVICT

Information received by Comanche County officials this week shows that F. A. Braun, charged here with the theft of two $1,000 Comanche County bonds, is an ex-convict.

Braun, alias Brown, served two penitentiary sentences from Harris County and one from Bexar County, totaling eight years. He was also investigated at Kansas City, and in San Antonio and Houston on other charges.

Braun, who lives at Dallas, was employed as a budget adviser by the Commissioners Court of Comanche County, and while here attending a Court meeting, took the two bonds, according to his own statement, and attempted to borrow money from a Dallas concern on one of them.

The bonds had been paid by Comanche County but had never been canceled and were still negotiable. They were recovered by Sheriff Dwight Brightman of Comanche who arrested Braun at Dallas recently.

The Identification Bureau of the Dallas Police Department shows that Braun has a record extending from 1915 to 1931.

Why Doctors Favor a Liquid Laxative

A doctor will tell you that the careless choice of laxatives is a common cause of chronic constipation.

Any hospital offers evidence of the harm done by harsh laxatives that drain the system, weaken the bowel muscles, and even affect the liver and kidneys.

Fortunately, the public is fast returning to laxatives in liquid form. The dose of a liquid laxative can be measured. The action can thus be controlled. It forms no habit; you needn't take a "double dose" a day or two later.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin has the average person's bowels regular as clockwork in a few weeks' time. Why not try it? Some pill or tablet may be more convenient to carry. But there is little "convenience" in any cathartic which is taken so frequently, you must carry it with you, wherever you go!

Its very taste tells you Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is wholesome. A pleasant taste, and delightful action, for expectant mothers, and children. All druggists, ready for use, in big bottles. Member N. R. A.

THE STORY OF Bulldog Drummond Strikes Back

CHAPTER I.
They always said that Algy was not the marrying kind. Many a time he had whittled away at Algy's indifferent heart, but none had succeeded in getting him to the point of proposing marriage. It was, therefore, a bit surprising to the friends of this man who was known throughout London as the inseparable pal of the famous Bulldog Drummond, when they learned he had fallen.

The elite of London had watched the wedding ceremony. Of course, Bulldog Drummond was there to set as best man. The affair took place in one of London's swankiest hotels, and society was there in force.

Drummond sighted Algy standing apart from the milling throng, trying to carry off the situation with a bright but somewhat fatuous smile.

"And behold! The bridegroom!" shouted Drummond as he extended both hands to Algy. My deepest congratulations, old boy. You're a lucky beggar.

"Thanks, Hugh," said Algy quietly. "They say I'll be very happy. Might be nice of you to come all the way back from the middle of Africa just to be at my wedding."

Drummond asked a servant to bring his topcoat and hat. Algy was alarmed: "I say, but you aren't going to leave me alone tonight, of all nights?"

"Tonight of all nights I should shall vanish into that fog possibly never to be seen again. So you can go home in peace, retire to your warm bed, and sleep the sleep of a tired but honest policeman."

"But you aren't going to walk in this fog?" said Nielson. "You can't see beyond the end of your nose!"

"We live in the same apartment building. You come with me in my car. I don't like the idea of your running around loose, dash it!"

"Sorry, but the fog seems to offer me what I want—peace and quiet," said Drummond. With a wave of his hand, he disappeared into the thick yellow mist with Nielson staring after him in uneasy perplexity. Unable to see more than a foot beyond the end of his nose in the heavy London fog, Drummond felt his way slowly along the sidewalk. He bumped into two pedestrians. Then he was jolted by a telephone pole. Mistaking the pole for a pedestrian, Drummond excused himself. He lighted a match and inspected the obstacle. The light not only revealed the pole but a very beautiful girl standing beside it. Tears were streaming down her cheeks.

"Who was that you just spoke to?" she cried excitedly.

"Why, nobody!"

"You did! I heard you. Was it a man or a woman?"

"Why—er—neither. It was a pole."

"You lie, I tell you! Why does everyone lie to me?" she cried.

leave you alone," replied Drummond. "Matter of custom, I suppose."

Algy sighed.

"Absolutely. But this is farewell, Algy. It's goodbye in more ways than one. I suspected it when I got your wedding invitation in Africa, and now after this I know it. Algy, this is the end not only of your adventuring but mine too! We're through. The old team of Algy and Drummond retires together, never again to fare forth into the night looking for excitement. Remember, Algy."

"But I say, I don't follow you."

"Never mind. Have you kissed your bride yet?"

"Well," pondered Algy, "not since the ceremony."

"Then go to her. She expects it."

"You mean to let me kiss her here—in public—before all these people?"

Drummond hurried Algy along. The bride was standing on the stairs, a crowd of young men awaiting their turn for the time-honored privilege of kissing the bride. Algy happily fell into line.

As Drummond stood smiling at the spectacle, he was accosted by Inspector Nielson of Scotland Yard. Nielson regarded Drummond glumly. Though the two men have known and liked each other for years, Nielson could not help but regard Drummond as an ill omen, a bleak kind of signal that trouble would start soon somewhere.

"Oh, my holy sainted Aunt! If it isn't Bulldog Drummond!" cried Nielson.

"Nielson, my dear fellow!" Drummond exclaimed, shaking the inspector's hand. "I am delighted. And how is Scotland Yard?"

"Drummond," said Nielson gravely as the two walked out of the hotel into the foggy night, "the minute you come to London, trouble starts, always. And you know it! The last time you were here some beggar tried to blow up the House of Parliament!"

"Dreadful, inspector. Perfectly dreadful!" Drummond pecked. "But I shan't disturb your peace and quiet any more. I am retiring. I am going to Sussex and devote the rest of my life to raising hollyhocks, those tall, very ugly flowers that have quite a bad smell. So I'll bid you farewell, inspector. Drummond continued. "In another minute withdrawing into the thick fog Drummond shouted to her and tried to follow, but the girl disappeared. As he stopped to ponder this unusual situation, a drunk stumbled into him.

"Lost! Lost in the fog!" mumbled the drunk. "What'll we do?"

"My advice to you," said Drummond, "is to hold tight to this pole. I shan't ask permission to phone in this house."

Leaving the drunk clinging to the pole, Drummond groped for the nearest house. The light above the door revealed a fashionable entrance. Drummond rattled the knocker. There was no answer. He tried again. Again no answer. He tried the knob. The door opened and he stepped inside. No one answered him as he shouted. His curiosity aroused, Drummond entered a room adjoining the hallway. Evidently it was the living room. A fire burned brightly in the fireplace and the hand and arm of a man could be seen extending from the divan in front of the fireplace. He walked slowly toward the divan and found stretched out at full length the body of a man drawn into a rather unnatural position. He was dead!

Drummond paused for a moment. He moved into the hallway, uncertain as to whether to go up the stairs or summon aid from the street. Deciding upon the latter course, he made his exit to the street and within the next block he found an officer. The two of them groped their way back to the house. The entrance door was locked. The bobby knocked. A butler of Oriental caste answered the door. Surprised at the turn of events, Drummond asked if they might come in. The butler hesitated, but noting the presence of the bobby, admitted them. But as Drummond moved down the hall, the butler stopped him.

"Now, now, sir, what is it you want?" said the butler. "We can't have this sort of thing!"

"I'm afraid you'll have to this time," said Drummond firmly but good-naturedly.

The bobby had become a bit worried. "Just a minute sir. This is all very highly irregular."

"But that body, officer," said Drummond, "that body is also very highly irregular."

CHAPTER II

"A body? What sort of a body?" said a new voice, and a distinguished-looking man of unmistakable Oriental race stepped through a door facing the group.

"Two minutes ago," said Drummond, "a body—the body of a man who died in great agony—was lying in that room."

"This is shocking," said the Oriental, "too shocking for me to ignore, sir. I am afraid I must insist on your looking again."

The party moved into the living room, and there, sitting at the piano, was a radiant, dark Oriental woman. Drummond, startled, approached her.

"Permit me," said the Oriental whom they had met at the door. "I am Prince Achmed of Shahvi. This is my daughter, Lady Jane Sothorn."

"Drummond is my name, sir—Hugh Drummond. At least, you were not in the room before, else I'd most certainly have noticed you," said Drummond, smiling.

Drummond turned toward the divan. A man was lying there in a similar position to the corpse he had seen three minutes before. But the figure now moved. It was all very mysterious.

"My most humble apologies, sir, for mistaking you—for a corpse."

"My husband," said Lady Jane, "Dr. Owen Sothorn."

Obviously drunk, the man on the divan acknowledged the introduction.

"And now," said Prince Achmed, "you are quite satisfied that we are harboring no bodies—violently dead or otherwise?"

"If you follow my advice," interjected the bobby, "you'll go home, sir."

"Thanks, officer. I always follow good advice. Good night." And with that Drummond made a hasty exit from the house.

A few minutes later, however, he was back at the entrance of the house carefully inspecting the doorstep for a cigarette butt he had tossed away on his first visit. He found the butt, which convinced him that he had not gone back to the wrong house the second time. As he straightened up, Drummond "Permit me," said Prince Achmed, "this is my daughter, Lady Jane Sothorn."

came face to face with Prince Achmed.

"If you place the slightest value on your life," said Achmed slowly, "I advise you to forget this whole incident."

.....

In the meantime Algy had settled quietly with his bride in a luxurious suite in a London hotel.

"Oh, Algy, I'm the happiest woman in all London," sighed Gwen as she kissed him on the cheek. He looked a bit embarrassed as she started for the bedroom.

"I thought I—I'd change," said Gwen.

"Probably a very good idea." But Algy was still nervous.

"Just one wee little moment, dear."

"It's all right—no hurry, you know," said Algy, embarrassed.

The phone rang violently. It was Drummond.

"But Hugh," Algy had a pleading note in his voice, "I can't leave here now. I really can't. Not yet, anyway. What I mean to say, Hugh, is—well, here I am and here she is, too. Kind of puts me in—well, you might call it a dilemma, don't you think?"

When Gwen returned to the room, a vision of loveliness in her silk and lace negligee, she found Algy with top coat and hat on.

"Oh—Algy! But Algy, you can't go now!"

"I must be getting along. I mean the truth is—no use beating around the bush—must be getting along about my business. Well, au revoir. That's the French goodbye, remember? Au revoir means go to—well, getting along."

As Algy departed, Gwen threw herself on the bed crying, "On my wedding night—au revoir!"

The dutiful Algy made his way to Bulldog Drummond's apartment to find him in conversation with Inspector Nielson who occupied the apartment above him. Drummond was relating his experience at Prince Achmed's home. The inspector dismissed the whole thing as one of Drummond's dreams.

"I don't believe a word of it," said Nielson. "In the first place, your Prince Achmed is a distinguished visitor to England, not a criminal. In the second place, you are a hare-brained young rascal who will probably next find an Egyptian mummy in your bath. And in the third place, I'm sleepy and I'm going to bed. Good night!" He slammed the door and stomped up the stairs to his apartment above.

"You believe me, don't you Algy?" said Drummond.

"Who? Me?" Algy's mind was not on the business at hand. He was thinking ruefully of Gwen. There was a knock on the door. Opening it, there stood the girl Drummond had met in the fog. Her eyes widened at the sight of him. With a little moan she swayed and fainted as Drummond grabbed her. He placed her on the divan to revive her.

"I wouldn't do that. If I were you," said Algy, "I'd come to my hotel near the docks. Then Uncle Paul left us about eleven this morning to make some kind of a report to the owner of the ship and that's the last we've seen of him."

"And who is the owner?" asked Drummond.

"Prince Achmed. That's the—"

"What about Prince Achmed?"

"That's the strange part of it. I went to his house this evening and they said Uncle Paul had never arrived there, and they acted so peculiar. That's what worries me so."

Drummond got on the phone and called Nielson's apartment. He explained what he had just learned. But Nielson's only reply was reminding Drummond for calling him out of bed to relate such fantastic tales.

"That settles it," said Drummond, as he turned to Algy. "We are in complete charge. Tell me all about Prince Achmed, Miss—"

"Miss Lola Field."

"Hugh Drummond. And the alert panther man on your left is Algy."

"Prince Achmed has been Uncle Paul's employer in the East for fifteen years. But recently, my Uncle got orders to sell everything the Prince owned and put every shilling into something. I don't know what it was. Uncle Paul wouldn't tell me. Then they loaded it on the Bombay, Girl and brought it to London."

CHAPTER III
"And you haven't the faintest idea what this cargo was?" asked Drummond.
"No. There's only one explanation I can offer, and it really isn't a very good explanation, because I don't know what it means. It's a radiogram in code. My Uncle got it at sea yesterday, and it upset him terribly. It was sent from Port Said on the Suez Canal, where we stopped to take a sick deck-hand ashore. And Aunt Martha, knowing how important it was, sent me to give it to him."
"Then your Aunt knows what it said?"
"Uncle Paul told her, I know, because she was terribly upset too."
"Then we're off, Algy!" shouted Drummond. "Parker, the car!
Algy, your things! Miss Field, your arm!"
Drummond and his party headed straight for the little waterfront hotel where Lola Field told them her Aunt was waiting for her return with news of her Uncle Paul.
Drummond was in high spirits. At last, he had found himself on the scene of a good adventure.
The hotel was a dingy affair, and several loafers were lounging about the small lobby as Drummond entered. As Lola went to the desk for her key, the clerk handed her a pen with which to register.
"I'm already registered. I want my key, please."
"What name, Miss?"
"Field—Lola Field. Room 34."

Drummond made a hasty exit, going straight into Neilson's apartment above.

Colman continues to vex C. Aubrey Smith, chief of Scotland Yard.

"Sorry. We have no one here by that name."
"Surely," said Lola, "something must be wrong."
At this point, Drummond asked
the clerk if they might look at the register. The clerk complied, but there was no record of Lola or her Uncle having registered.
"We want to see room 34. Have you any objections?" Drummond asked politely.
"None at all, sir. If you'll come with me."

The clerk, followed by Drummond, Algy and Lola, filed down the dark hallway, stopping at room 34.
The clerk rapped lightly on the door. It opened and a man clad in pajamas and bathrobe appeared.
"I'm sorry, sir," said the clerk,
"but this young lady would like to see the room. Just one minute, that's all."
"Is this your room?" asked
Drummond.
"No, it's not. It's not the same furniture," said Lola, "nor wallpaper."

"How long have you occupied this room?" asked Drummond turning to the roomer.
"Will you get out of here! I mean the whole lot of you! What kind of a hotel is this? A lot of blokes come crashing in on a man
on his wedding night!"
"You say this is your wedding
night?" queried Algy, meekly.
"I do! And what's more, I can prove it! Now get out!"
"Say no more," said Algy, grasping the roomer's hand and shaking
it. "I know just how you feel."

"As the clerk bowed Drummond out the door, he said, "I'm sure the little lady has just got a bit confused, sir."
"Thank you, Captain Drummond," said Lola, extending her hand, "and Goodnight!"
"I had no right to put you to all this trouble," said Lola. "I had no whimsically, "placing me in that category? Stranger! Humph! That's odd. Because I feel as though we'd known each other all our lives. But let's have the radiogram. You have it, haven't you?"

"Yes, but I don't feel as though I should."
"Don't you trust me?"
"Trust you!" The tone in Lola's voice implied that she would trust him all her life. "It's only that I feel you've done enough. More than enough." She smiled impulsively and handed him the radiogram.
"Splendid!" Drummond smiled.
"Algy, how's the old noodle—on edge?"
"Excellent!" said Drummond.
"Working like a whip. I see! Now follow me. Copy this message." He handed Algy the radiogram.
"But Hugh," complained Algy. "I haven't decoded a message since the Armistice."
Algy took a piece of paper from his pocket and, standing under the street lamp, began to copy off the radiogram as Drummond moved to the car to help Lola to her seat.
"You still believe me," said Lola,
"after all this?"
"I do," said Drummond, "though I shouldn't. When you knocked at my door and faintly in my arms, I said to myself, 'This is serious. But there's no sense to it. It's not even a lark any more.'"
"Really, I can't begin to tell you

CHAPTER IV
Neilson was more furious than ever at Drummond's intrusion. Protesting disagreeably, he allowed himself to be forced into his dressing robe and hurried out of the door
by Drummond, who insisted that he had in his room evidence that would prove there was something wrong
with the distinguished Prince Ach-med of Shahvi.
"Do you realize that you're beginning to haunt me like a nightmare?"
moaned Neilson. "Oh, Drummond,
you young devil, what troubles you are making for me. Of course, you know what we're going to find now,
don't you?"
"What, my shrewd friend?"
"Why the girl's gone, of course;
been kidnapped or some rot like that, and I warn you, Drummond, I shan't swallow it. I swear I shan't."
When Drummond led Neilson into the apartment, Lola was not in the room. Drummond searched frantically for her.
"She's gone! She's been kidnapped!"
"May I go back to bed now?" said
Neilson, impatiently.
"But I tell you this is serious, Neilson. She's here. I swear it."
Drummond, you found a body—it disappeared. You found a girl—she disappeared—and it disappeared. Everything seems to disappear but you!"
"But, Neilson, as a personal favor—as the favor of one friend to another, I want a couple of your men to go with me to Prince Ach-med's house and search it—now!"
Inspector Neilson seized the telephone and called for his headquar-

Hello! Colonel Neilson speaking. I realize that I've been telling the truth the whole night long."

Drummond triumphantly threw open the door to his apartment.
There was not a soul in the place.
Drummond was in a panic. Not only had Mrs. Field disappeared, but the servant, also.
"Drummond, you are a blithering, blasted, young fool. You'll drive me insane!" Neilson grabbed the phone and got Scotland Yard again. "Send two men. Better make it six—to my apartment house. Apartment F, to pick up a man and throw him in a cell. Yes, I'll have him under lock and key until you get here."
With that, Neilson stepped out of the apartment, slamming the door, locking it. A dull thud attracted Drummond's attention to the kitchen. There he found his servant gagged and bound to a chair. He untied him, and with the long rope lowered himself out of the window and to the ground.
Achmed had succeeded in bringing Lola out of the drug stupor in which she had lapsed after being forcibly kidnapped from Drummond's apartment. Lola was bewildered when she found herself looking at Achmed.
"Where are they? My uncle and aunt?"
"Please don't excite yourself," said Achmed calmly. "Your Uncle is dead. We will discuss that another time."
"And my aunt?"
"Safe—so far."
"What do you mean?"
"Miss Field," said Achmed, leaning forward. "I shan't try to mislead you any longer. It is impossible to exaggerate the delicacy of your present situation—yours and

At this point, Drummond asked
the clerk if they might look at the register. The clerk complied, but there was no record of Lola or her Uncle having registered.
"We want to see room 34. Have you any objections?" Drummond
asked politely.
"None at all, sir. If you'll come
with me."

The clerk, followed by Drummond, Algy and Lola, filed down the dark hallway, stopping at room 34.
The clerk rapped lightly on the door. It opened and a man clad
in pajamas and bathrobe appeared.
"I'm sorry, sir," said the clerk,
"but this young lady would like to see the room. Just one minute,
that's all."
"Is this your room?" asked
Drummond.
"No, it's not. It's not the same
furniture," said Lola, "nor wall-
paper."

"How long have you occupied this room?" asked Drummond turning to
the roomer.
"Will you get out of here! I mean
the whole lot of you! What kind of a hotel is this? A lot of blokes come crashing in on a man
on his wedding night!"
"You say this is your wedding
night?" queried Algy, meekly.
"I do! And what's more, I can prove it! Now get out!"
"Say no more," said Algy, grasping the roomer's hand and shaking
it. "I know just how you feel."

out the door, he said, "I'm sure the little lady has just got a bit con-

CHAPTER IV
Neilson was more furious than ever at Drummond's intrusion. Protesting disagreeably, he allowed
himself to be forced into his dressing robe and hurried out of the door
by Drummond, who insisted that he had in his room evidence that would prove there was something wrong
with the distinguished Prince Ach-
med of Shahvi.
"Do you realize that you're beginning to haunt me like a nightmare?"
moaned Neilson. "Oh, Drummond,
you young devil, what troubles you
are making for me. Of course, you know what we're going to find now,
don't you?"
"What, my shrewd friend?"
"Why the girl's gone, of course;
been kidnapped or some rot like
that, and I warn you, Drummond, I shan't swallow it. I swear I shan't."
When Drummond led Neilson into
the apartment, Lola was not in the room. Drummond searched frantically for her.
"She's gone! She's been kidnapped!"
"May I go back to bed now?" said
Neilson, impatiently.
"But I tell you this is serious, Neilson. She's here. I swear it."
Drummond, you found a body—it disappeared. You found a girl—she disappeared—and it disappeared. Everything seems to disappear but you!"
"But, Neilson, as a personal favor—as the favor of one friend to another, I want a couple of your
men to go with me to Prince Ach-
med's house and search it—now!"
Inspector Neilson seized the telephone and called for his headquar-

CHAPTER V

"Where is it?" Achmed shouted, shaking his fist at Drummond. "Give it back to me!"

"I haven't got it!"

"Search him, you fools! Give it to me. I tell you, Drummond, I swear I'll kill you!"

The French windows at the side of the room flew open and the two bobbies who had been stationed out in front of the house stumbled in. "Ere, now—wot's all this? Open up!"

"Och, doing all this 'ere now?"

"Matter of fact, officer, I am," said Drummond, apologetically.

"It's 'im, Bulldog Drummond!" said one of the bobbies. "It's all right, Prince Achmed. We'll 'andle 'im for you."

Achmed protested that it wasn't necessary to remove Drummond, but the bobbies insisted and marched the happy Drummond to the door and out to the street, where they told him to go home and behave himself. Drummond thanked the officers for their gentle manner in handling his case, and bid them adieu. As he was leaving, a taxicab pulled up to the curb. Drummond turned in time to see Algy get out and enter the iron gates leading to the house.

With no time to lose, Drummond dashed to his parked car and took a gun from the side pocket, checking the chambers to make sure it was loaded.

Algy happily rang the bell to the house and asked for Captain Drummond. He was quickly admitted.

barrased that she should have called Drummond by his first name. "I am not leaving until you do."

"Lola, dearest," pleaded Drummond, "don't you see that I've got to go back there after Algy?"

"Then I'll be waiting right here."

"Darling..." Drummond makes his way back to the house and quietly enters the dark living room of the Prince's home through the French windows, gun in hand. He had taken no more than two or three steps into the room when the lights were suddenly turned on. Facing Drummond are Achmed, Lady Jane and the servants. Achmed had a pistol in his hand. Drummond advanced toward him with his gun held steadily on him. Before he could take three steps an Oriental grabbed Drummond from behind and disarmed him.

"Drummond," said Achmed, "we may as well speak bluntly. I'm quite willing to admit I am without experience in violence like this. I am not a criminal by choice or habit, but you must believe me when I say I am prepared to go to any lengths to get possession of that radiogram. Even to killing you... if that is necessary!"

"My dear fellow," said Drummond, "you are without doubt one of the most engaging blackguards I have ever encountered."

"I have but twenty minutes to give you. By then, my ship will arrive safely at its dock and nothing that either of you or that radiogram could do then would affect me in the slightest. So if you care anything for your life or the life

"Be pretty nice if we could get the whole matter straightened out," said Algy.

Colman and Charles Butterworth do some love plotting—in a cellar.

Achmed inquired if Algy is Drummond's friend, to which Algy agrees. "Then come right in, sir. You're indeed welcome," said Achmed. "I can stay but a minute, though," said Algy. "Drummond will be right up, I suppose."

"What do you wish to see him about?"

"I decoded a radiogram for him. Probably not ten men in London could have done it, either. You see, I use the army system."

"And you have this translation with you?" snarled Achmed.

"Oh, yes. Be pretty stupid of me to translate it for him and then forget to bring it."

"Give it to me!" shouted Achmed, seizing Algy by the throat.

The telephone rang. Started, Achmed grabbed it quickly. It is Inspector Nielson, who wants to know if Drummond has been annoying the Prince. Nielson just discovered his prisoner's escape. Achmed was amused and hung up the receiver with a smile.

"Where is the girl?" he demanded to know of one of his servants. Upon being assured that she was locked in a room upstairs, he instructed the servants to throw Algy in the cellar.

Fearing that the worst is about to happen to Algy, Drummond returned to the house and again placed a ladder under a chamber window. Hoping to effect the rescue of Lola and possibly Algy, whom he figured had been imprisoned in one of the bedrooms. Upon entering the room, Drummond found Mrs. Field and Lola both bound and gagged. He carried Lola down the ladder, then returned and rescued her Aunt. Drummond took the two women to his car and told them that he is returning to the house to get Algy. Lola refused to allow Drummond to return alone. She insisted on going with him.

"No use," said Lola stubbornly. "I'm not going without you, Hugh."

"Say that again," Drummond smiled.

"Oh! Lola is somewhat em-

MRS. J. BURGESS RUDD

Most of the tires offered you to-day are thoroughly good tires. But the claims made for some of them are so broad... in some cases, so preposterous... that it's well to stop for a minute and analyze them... sanely.

Do you really believe, for example:

That any tire-maker can, practically over-night, add forty per cent... or fifty per cent, to the serviceable mileage of his product?

That, any manufacturer can, to the exclusion of other manufacturers, make a blowout-proof tire? Low pressure tires don't pop the way high pressure tires did. Yes, you're just as safe against blowouts on Federals as on any other make of good tires.

Let's pass that one.

Examine the other absurd claims that are going the rounds. They don't add one mile of service. And then place your business with some dealer in whom you have confidence. He knows tires and will protect you. We sell Federal tires. In Federal, quality standards have been maintained since Federal started, almost a quarter of a century ago.

We, for our part, have built a reputation for good service and sound values. We would like to have your tire business and we guarantee to give you your money's worth.

Let the Federal Tire Bond protect you, unconditionally for 12 months against all road hazards. You hear a lot about guarantees just now, so it's well to remember that Federal took this step over a year ago.

CHAPTER VI

The two stealthily climbed the cellar stairs, but before they reached the top step a figure stepped out of the shadows behind them.

"Your hands up, sir!" said an Oriental. "Walk straight ahead, sir—both of you."

"I must say, sir," said Achmed as the two were led into his presence in the living room, "I've rarely had the pleasure of knowing so courageous a fighter."

"You understand, of course, that a translation of your radiogram is already on its way to Scotland Yard?" It is too late now. Within an hour my ship will be leaving and then, farewell to England!"

Drummond looked at Algy and then at the French window. The same thought enters both minds. They make a run for the window. Drummond grabbed the latch, but as he did so, there is a sharp crack of a pistol and a pane of glass was shattered.

"I'm afraid the next one, Drummond, will have to be yours anyway. Your twenty minutes is up and you have failed to divulge the whereabouts of the message. Therefore, you force me to exact from you the extreme penalty for your courageous but stupid silence," Achmed slowly pointed his revolver at Drummond.

"And now what's going on in 'ere?" Wot's this all about 'ere?" The two mousy bobbies have heard the shot and have come to see what the disturbance is about.

"Ere, now. 'Oo's shooting 'oo?"

"Look, AH, it's Drummond again!"

"Well, strike me pink! 'Ow did

"Off-hand, I can't recall a single law you haven't broken tonight."

"I shall see to it myself, Captain Drummond," said Achmed, who had joined the group, "that you answer in court for every shilling you have cost me tonight!"

"Really?" said Drummond casually. "May I have a cigarette?"

For an instant Achmed is taken back at such apparent casualness. Then, as he produces his leather telescope-type cigarette case and opens it politely, he is compelled to smile in admiration. He offered the cigarettes to Drummond, who reached, instead, for the top of the case; and, the instant it is in his hand, Achmed realized the significance of his having found the case on the floor in his house after the struggle for the radiogram. He grabbed for it, but Drummond had it and held it back.

"This is a radiogram received by this young lady's uncle, Paul Field, aboard this ship. It is in code and concerns the mysterious death of a sailor who was taken ashore at Port Said..."

Algy came bustling into the scene with the code book which he had gotten from the wireless room.

"You're right, Hugh...colic was wrong."

Drummond snatched the book from Algy's hands, and turned to Nielson. "Here is the radiogram...and here is the ship's code book. And you will be quite right, inspector, when you say I am mad, completely mad, if the last word in the radiogram is not colic—but cholera!"

There is a pause as Nielson hastily

"I have the pleasure of informing you that a marriage has been arranged."

Colman and Miss Young find the climax a doubly happy one.

you get in again?" said the startled bobbie. "Captain Drummond, we've got orders to place you under arrest."

The bobbies march Drummond and Algy out to the street.

"My thanks, my personal thanks," said Drummond, shaking the bobbies by the hand. "You shall both be promoted for this." And with that Drummond and Algy dash off into the fog, leaving the two bobbies staring at each other. Algy and Drummond reached their car and with a roar they careen down the street. They had barely disappeared in the fog before Achmed and his party in a tightly curtained limousine came swirling out of the driveway, and disappeared in the same direction.

"Probably none of my business," said Algy. "But where are we going?"

"To the docks!" replied Drummond.

The crew of the Bombay Girl was hastily unloading the last crates from the boat when Drummond and Algy brought their car to a stop with a screech. The two jumped from the car and dashed up the gangplank just as Achmed's car swung onto the dock.

"Get that maniac!" shouted Achmed before he had time to get out of his car. Several men started after Drummond and Algy as they dashed into the gangway.

"Find the wireless room—get the code book!" shouted Drummond, as he dashed down to the engine room. Grabbing several pieces of waste, he lighted them and threw them into the fuel rooms below. Making a run for the stairs, he gained the deck just as two men with guns halted him. The fire had started to spread throughout the ship. Drummond was hastily marched to the gangplank where he was joined by several other men with their hands in the air, all members of the crew.

As Drummond joined the other prisoners, he saw Nielson and Lola. "Oh, my blessed inspector, and my thrice-blessed Lola! Into your hands... safe at last!"

"I'm afraid you're in for it this time, Drummond," said Nielson.

compares the radiogram with the code book. "Died of cholera! Cholera!" Nielson looked at Achmed. "And you were endeavoring to smuggle infected cargo ashore? To risk the starting of a terrible plague!"

"It is useless to profess innocence any longer. Every penny I had was in that cargo," said Achmed with dignity. "Gentlemen, I have lost."

"You know he was probably a very nice fellow," said Algy. "Once you got used to his way of looking at things."

Inspector Nielson took charge of Achmed and his party as Drummond, Algy and Lola marched off in triumph. Algy saying that he must get back to his bride.

"Oh, my darling, are you hurt?" shouted Gwen as Algy shuffled into the hotel room.

"Oddly enough, I don't think so."

"Oh, you poor, poor little thing. Just sit right here and I'll get you some nice hot tea."

Wouldn't mind making that bicarbonate of soda, would you?" said Algy, holding his stomach and recalling the message he ate at Achmed's house.

The telephone rings and Algy wearily answers: Oh, hello, Hugh... What's new?"

"My dear fellow," said Drummond, "I have the pleasure of informing you that a marriage has been arranged, and will take place the instant you and Gwen arrive to witness the ceremony. Of course, I know that you are—a—but surely you can't sleep at this hour! Why, it's broad daylight! Come right over!"

"Who was that?" asked Gwen as she brought Algy his tea.

"That was Hugh. Just wanted you to come and witness a wedding. Says he and Lola are going to get married right away."

"The way it's beginning to look," said Gwen, wearily, "I might just as well never have brought these pajamas at all."

"That's all right, dear, let's go. Who knows but what we may be very happy in our quiet, platonic way?"

BURTON THANKS THE VOTERS

I take this opportunity of thanking the voters of Comanche County, who so kindly worked and voted for my nomination in the run-off primary last Saturday.

I renew my pledge, made when I announced, to do every thing in my power to make the good people of Comanche County a courteous, efficient and thorough administrator of the affairs of the office of County Clerk.

PROCTOR SCHOOL OPENS MONDAY

According to the announcement of R. L. Fortune, Superintendent, the Proctor School will begin the 1934-35 session on Monday, September 3rd.

Mr. Fortune states that the three school busses have been reworked and are in good condition to serve their respective routes. He also stated that the faculty of the school had been completed. J. M. Bush, who has recently moved to Proctor from Garrison will direct the vocational agriculture department. A course in home economics will be offered also, Mr. Fortune said.

An enrollment of 200 or more is expected, according to the superintendent and he invites patrons and friends of the school to come to the auditorium Monday for the opening exercises, which will start at 9 o'clock.

Emergency Loan Office Now Offers Additional Loans

J. M. Andrews, Field Supervisor for the Emergency Crop Loan Office advises that loans may be made for the purpose of summer fallowing and the purchase of seed for planting wheat and other small grain at the Emergency Loan Office in Comanche.

One dollar per acre for summer fallowing and one dollar per acre for seed for planting wheat and other small grain will be loaned. Maximum amount to any applicant is $400.00.

Note and mortgage covering the crop to be planted will be taken, payable August 31, 1935. Interest at the rate of five and one half per centum per annum.

This should not be confused with the loan that is being made for the purchase of feed for livestock as this is a separate and distinct loan.

The loan for the planting of wheat and small grain must be made by September 15, 1934, but the loan for the purchase of feed for feeding livestock does not expire on Sept. 15, and will be available until further notice.

Miss Alice Robertson has an office in the State National Bank building and will furnish information desired regarding either loan.

Applications Are Mailed by Local Cotton Committee

The Comanche County Cotton Allotment Committee mailed applications Thursday to College Station, for tax exemption certificates under the Bankhead Act.

County Agent J. A. Barton said certificates will be issued at the State Headquarters and may be expected here within 12 days.

He also stated that farmers who had 1933 and 1934 cotton only will get allotment from a 10 per cent state reserve pool and these applicants will be longer in receiving certificates.

MAN IS CHARGED WITH BURGLARY

Charles Ables, charged with burglary on August 17th, of the residence of George Heard of Comyn, was arrested in Baird Wednesday by Sheriff Dwight Brightman, of Comanche County, and Deputy Sheriff Blackie Martin, of Erath County.

At the time of his arrest, Ables had in his possession a .38-Caliber Colt's pistol, identified by Bob McCampbell and Mr. Heard as the property of Mr. Heard.

Ables was returned to Comanche County by Sheriff Brightman. He waived an examining trial and Justice J. V. White of De Leon set his bond at two thousand dollars. He was then remanded to jail.

Wid Spivey Issues Thanks To Voters

I wish to express my thanks to the many loyal friends and supporters who voted for me in the Sheriff's race in the run-off primary.

Even though I came out loser in the race, the renewing of old friendships and the forming of new ones has made the time and effort spent worthwhile.

For the kind and courteous treatment which was uniformly accorded me, by the people throughout the entire county during my campaign, I am deeply appreciative.

Whether you saw fit to cast your vote for me or not, I shall cherish no ill will toward you; and I trust I may have a continuation of your friendship during the coming years.

Respectfully yours,
